From the L. L. Port Folio. THE DESERTED WIFE.

By Mrs. Harriet Muzzy. It was a dark and stormy evening; with no companion save her own me-lancholy reflections, Helen Mordaunt had long sat watching the rain that beat against the casement, casting at intervals glances of anxious fondness towards the couch of her slumbering child. The small apartment was lighted by one solitary lamp, that east its feeble gleam upon the angelic countenance of the little innocent, who slept in sweet unconsciousness of her mother's sorrows. Helen approached to gaze upon her treasure, and her warm tear fell upon the dimpled hand that lay upon the covering. "My child, my Rosabelle!" she softly murmured 'where is now your unhappy father?' how can he thus disso desert us? how shall I struggle for to po you, my blessed one? how bear up the u against these accumulated woes? The mother removed from the couch, fearing her sobs would awaken her child—she sat down in the farthest way to those agonizing tears caused by regret for the past anguish for to ch future Whoever had seen the lonely mourner at this moment, scanned her small and meanly furnished apartment, her neglected dress, her faded cheek, nd listened to the deep pathos of her desponding accents, could not have recognized her for the gay, blooming, brilliant girl, who five years before, at the early age of seventeen, had become the bride of Henry Mordaunt,—then, blest with an ample independence, sarrounded by smiling friends, radient with conscious beauty, happy in propitious leve, a more charming vision never met the eyel—Now, with scarcely the means to support a miserable exstence, far from her former home and early friends, forsaken by an unworthy husband; and a prey to unavailing regrets, Helen could look back with no feeling save that of retack with no feeling save that of repentance; to the days of her ill-judging; romantic youth, when she lislened only to the dictates of fancy &
